Le Fay: a literary fantasy short story S. E. Lee

WHEN tall, pale, and strikingly beautiful Morgaine of Cornwall, raised to be queen and ruler, discovers that a newly discovered male half-brother is to be named heir in her stead, she vows to do whatever it takes to regain her place of power and status, the crown that is hers by right of blood. But will she take the crown, or, when faced with a far greater power and ability, choose a far greater challenge?

A 3400-word literary fantasy short story.

EXCERPT:

I am named Morgaine, and I am doomed to die for being who I am.

My life is forfeit should I return to the castle as I am now, merely a woman without a sword arm and a vast army behind me.

A sword yielded by a betraying woman, and taken by a man.

The scheming old man Merlin and the half-bastard brother of mine would take everything away from me, and raised as I was, I cannot allow that to pass.

And yet, it is because I was raised as I was--princess, ruler, judgment-passer--that I am here before the fairy circle, taking stock of who I am and where I came from, and what I come for, before I enter.

Females may lead, but rare are the ones that fight with the force of their fists and muscles. Rarer still the ones who leap into battle with the fervor and skill of a warrior able to bring her enemies down by her own hand and strength. I had lessons, rare for my class, but my mother insisted.

The other women insisted I learn the despised needleworking skills and herbals, and so I came to womanhood with a dual education, and a dual nature, albeit not that of a fierce male fighter, in this battle-worn land.

I am no Boudicca, fierce warrior woman, but I am meant to be Queen, and shall be so.
