' Tell me," Elena asked him, ' were there any remarkable men among your comrades ?' Bersenyev was again reminded of Shubin's words. ' No, Elena Nikolaevna, to tell you the truth, there was not a single remarkable man among us. And, indeed, where are such to be found! There was, they say, a good time once in the Moscow university! But not now. Now it's a school, not a university. I was not happy with my comrades,' he added, dropping his voice. ' Not happy,' murmured Elena. ' But I ought,' continued Bersenyev, ' to make an exception. I know one student--it's true he is not in the same faculty--he is certainly a remarkable man.' 'What is his name?' Elena inquired with interest. ' Insarov Dmitri Nikanorovitch. He is a Bulgarian.' ' Not a Russian ?' ' No, he is not a Russian.' ' Why is he living in Moscow, then ?' ' He came here to study. And do you know with what aim he is studying ? He has a single idea: the liberation of his country. And his story is an exceptional one. His father was a fairly well-to-do merchant; he came from Tirnova. Tirnova is now a small town, but it was the capital of Bulgaria in the old days when Bulgaria was still an independent state. He traded with Sophia, and had relations with Russia ; his sister, Insarov's aunt, is still living in Kiev, married to a senior history teacher in the gymnasium there. In 1835, that is to say eighteen years ago, a terrible crime was committed; Insarov's mother suddenly disappeared without leaving a trace behind; a week later she was found murdered.' Elena shuddered. Bersenyev stopped. ' Go on, go on,' she said. ' There were rumours that she had been outraged and murdered by a Turkish aga; her husband, Insarov's father, found out the truth, tried to avenge her, but only succeeded in wounding the aga with his poniard. . . . He was ...
